Isotope fractionation of ^{182}W and ^{18}F in solution and solid phase, and corrections for mass-dependent and temperature effects on the observed equilibrium constants. The isotope fractionation of ^{182}W and ^{18}F in solution and in solid-phase has been measured. The results show that there is significant fractionation of ^{182}W and ^{18}F in solution and there is less isotope fractionation of ^{182}W than that of ^{18}F . It is argued that the isotope fractionation observed in the solid-phase is largely caused by intrinsic mass-dependent fractionation. Corrections to mass-dependent fractionation in solutions and solid-phase have been applied. The corrected fractionation factors were 0.988 ± 0.066 for ^{18}F and 0.98 ± 0.06 for ^{182}W . From this result, the possibility of using the corrected fractionation factors to correct the decay temperature is discussed.

Diversity in nasal T lymphocytes in health and disease. The nose is a strategic entry point for pathogens and a site where we encounter diverse commensal flora. A number of studies have revealed that a dynamic distribution of T lymphocytes with distinct phenotypes and functions exist in the human nasal mucosa. However, there are only a handful of studies that have investigated the importance of T lymphocytes in the regulation of immune responses in the respiratory tract. Although T lymphocytes dominate in nasal mucosal immune responses against most pathogens, the role of CD4^+ and CD8^+ T cells is not well understood, and it is unknown whether CD4^+ and CD8^+ T cells are involved in protective immune responses at the nose. In this paper, we will discuss the diversity in nasal T lymphocytes in health and disease and the implications for the potential immunogenicity of the nose.
