The invention relates to a process for the manufacture of cyclo-olefin polymer by polymerizing cyclo-olefins. Cyclo-olefins can be polymerized in the presence of metallocenes to give polymers having high and predictable properties. For instance, high molecular weight polymers of cycloolefins having recurring or pendant aromatic structures can be prepared by the process disclosed in Japanese Kokai No. 9-83796. The cyclic olefin polymer prepared in accordance with this process is highly crystalline and can have a high molecular weight. The crystals in this polymer can contain a substantial amount of oxygen, which is believed to result from the use of hydrogen in preparing metallocene complexes. Although these polymers have high molecular weights, and in particular have a narrow molecular weight distribution, they may not be capable of being readily melted and shaped without degradation. Thus, to prepare films or molded articles of polymers of cyclo-olefins, there is still a need to find an acceptable process for preparing cyclo-olefin polymers capable of being melt processed. In one aspect, the invention is a process for preparing a cyclo-olefin polymer. The process includes mixing a cyclo-olefin, metallocene catalysts and an aluminum alkyl compound and contacting the mixture with hydrogen and a catalyst activator under a condition of superatmospheric pressure and temperature sufficient to form a solid polymer.

Q: What is the difference between filtering by AP (when activating WiFi) and filtering by MAC? When a WiFi connection is active, you can tell it "Filter by AP" (which lets you choose your router by MAC or WPS), or you can filter by MAC, which lets you choose the router by MAC. What is the difference between the two? Does filtering by AP actually add some extra security? How does each work? A: For most WiFi equipment, they use the same 'sensor' to determine the APs that are nearby and notify the user. So when you use mac filtering, you are telling your router which APs are around you. It usually works by one of the following ways : Your WiFi Card supports AP-level mac filtering You can use an 'anti-mac' script which blocks all unwanted mac addresses. Whereas with WPS, you are controlling the WPS PIN and letting your router auto-configure all APs in your area. So the WPS
