American and United Airlines have begun filling their hold spaces with the stuff sacks they call X-Bags, which are basically empty grocery bags. The idea is to see whether airline passengers will take their carry-on bags through the boarding line and into the flight itself. While the X-Bags seem like a great deal for the airlines, they're a very big waste of plastic bags for the average passenger. Several major airlines are pushing to remove plastic bags from the baggage carts at their airports and elsewhere, but a significant number of people are either still using them, or simply don't realize they need to do anything. One of the more notable examples of this is United Airlines. After the airline announced that they would no longer accept plastic bags at US airports, a Wall Street Journal reporter observed that half a dozen passengers were still using them on the flight, and then a passenger told her he thought she had to pay for it as part of the flight's baggage charges. It turns out that when you check the X-Bags online, it says they are "standard carry-on bags" so you don't need to pay extra for them. Still, in the US some passengers do try to use them like carry-on bags, d0c515b9f4
