1080p .Variability in QTc correction formulae in clinical practice. A number of corrected QT (QTc) regression models have been developed for clinical purposes. While these regression models have been demonstrated to be reliable, the models were developed based on normal ECG recording conditions that vary with age. Knowledge of individual differences in QTc correction formulae based on clinical characteristics is important. The present study was conducted to examine the reliability of QTc correction formulae at the outpatient clinic and the prevalence of individual differences in QTc correction formulae. A total of 1010 ECGs was analyzed and the following findings were obtained: (1) The QTc correction formulae greatly varied by age; the Bazett ($QTc = QT/RR(1/2)$) and Fridericia ($QTc = QT/RR(1/3)$) correction formulae were usually used in the very young and elderly, respectively. (2) The formulae significantly varied by sex; the Fridericia correction formula was better in males, while the QTc
