Nokia X6 16GB Firmware Download. The latest original software / firmware of Nokia X6 has been released recently and it is free for all. The present invention is generally directed to the field of microperfusion, and more particularly, to the field of microperfusion of tissue by a continuous flow of a perfusate fluid through channels formed in or placed within the tissue. The field of microperfusion of microvessels formed in or within a tissue has been the subject of extensive research for many years. See, for example, Doig et al., 1986, Science 234:1201, which discusses the state of the art in the "microcirculation field". The reasons for designing a continuous flow system are discussed in Doig et al., 1986. Microperfusion has been shown to be effective in treating tissue for conditions such as wounds, burns, tumors and for diseases such as genetic disorders and some types of liver disease. Furthermore, the microperfusion system is relatively inexpensive and easy to construct, thus, suitable for use in treatment of human patients. Perfusion of microvessels in the brain has been attempted for many years. Since blood flow through the vessels is continuous in the brain, it has been difficult to obtain reliable measurements of perfusion through the blood vessels. Therefore, studies of perfusion through the brain microvessels generally have been performed by several methods. In one method, a radioactive tracer is injected into a vein or artery that flows through the brain and the areas of interest. Another technique used in measuring perfusion in the brain microvessels has been the selective sampling of a perfusate from the microvessels. As noted above, the blood flow through brain microvessels is continuous. Thus, samples of perfusate will be collected from the microvessels in a steady state manner if the perfusate flow is sufficient in comparison to the blood flow through the microvessels. In this manner, samples of perfusate are collected and are compared to one another. If the perfusate from the cerebral cortex has a higher concentration of a perfusate component than the perfusate from the spinal cord, the microvessels in the spinal cord do not have a sufficiently high rate of perfusion to collect a sample of perfusate from the spinal cord. Thus, the cerebral perfusion in a patient would be increased by the application of the perfusion solution to the patient. This method provides a means of monitoring
