There are only three full-time jobs in the world that are not held by robots or machines (HOLODZHNY, PAMET, and SURVIVAL). All three jobs sound utterly ridiculous to us, but that doesn't mean they aren't the reality of the new era of work. In the past, most jobs were fairly routine and performed monotonously, sometimes to the extreme. But in the coming years, we are going to see a dramatic shift in the way work is done. Due to the meteoric rise of artificial intelligence, the robot-human partnership is going to usher in a new era of work. This work will not be just a matter of programming a machine with some pre-established functionalities, using logic to define the way they work. This work will also encompass the physical aspects of manufacturing and installation, with the machines that do the work taking on a more animal-like form, blending into our lives. From this new perspective, robots will replace not just assembly and disassembly, but also many of the tasks associated with customer service, such as product installation. Examples of this are already becoming common around the world, but the near future may see them in your office, at the mall, or in the bed and breakfast. As a result, we will no longer work in separate job categories like "travel agents" or "telemarketers." Some people will become "machine operators" or "computer technicians" (think brick-and-mortar and web-based stores, respectively). And even before robots start taking our jobs, the transformation of work is already affecting how we think about work. The Rise of The Machine Operator When working at McDonald's, a shift worker has to make decisions about how to best perform each task, sometimes involving personal interaction. At Walmart, a shelf stocker can set their own speed. c6a93da74d
