We've been mapping the genome of these diseases, from very tiny regions of DNA which are responsible for giving the diseases their characteristics, to the entire genome. We're currently at the point where we can map the location of every piece of DNA within the genome, and what genes it contains. The study of plant diseases has to be expanded to consider the effect of the environment on the plant. This includes considering everything from ambient temperature levels during the growing season to regions with differing rainfall. The coming years could well be the time when we gain a major insight into the way that specific plant diseases are distributed, for example exactly where they are located, and exactly what types of growing systems might be more or less vulnerable to them. This will permit farmers to be more proactive in the fight against plant diseases, plus it will provide governments more power in the fight.
