but, theres another reason you should be worried about hackers hacking your computers and networks. so, if youve ever wondered how the hackers were able to get so much information about you and your network, i think you now have a good idea. and, your not the only one. theres no evidence yet that the hackers got any data from the users or that they were able to do anything with that data. but, all these companies are telling you that theyve been hacked. in fact, the u.s. department of homeland security says cyberattacks against government entities have more than tripled so far this year. and, the russian government has warned about thousands of cyberattacks against the united states and other countries. john thompson, managing director at bae systems cybersecurity, says that in the future, the next generation of internet-connected devices will be so capable that theyll think and act like humans. theyll be smart enough to understand context and make decisions about what they should do. and theyll talk to each other, using the same code, to inform each other about what they should do. a major challenge of such a network, he says, will be to maintain the trust and security of these devices. the focus of the fbis counter-cyber-espionage effort is to use existing employees of a targeted company to secretly gain access to its networks. in one such operation, a former federal agent with access to the networks of defense contractor booz allen hamilton was charged with attempting to steal the files of 21.5 million of its clients. of course, a lot of the time, these kind of counter-espionage operations are compromised almost from the start. in one case, former nsa employee turned whistleblower edward snowden gave the fbi a list of more than 5,000 e-mail accounts and passwords of nsa employees. the agency used the credentials to hack into the accounts of hundreds of nsa contractors.

Hackers can use the information to navigate to a website where they'll download malware. Once the malware has infected your phone, they can use that phone to impersonate you. That's what the hackers did in the Target breach. Once they got into Target's network, they could send phishing emails with malware and take over customers' devices to steal bank information. When this happens, you'll see a link to some other site that you're not expecting. Follow the link and a series of popup windows will start to load automatically. Theoretically, every public-facing app should have a strategy for dealing with malicious or abusive content. However, only a small percentage of app developers have implemented that strategy.

Facebook is urging developers of all kinds to take the time to learn and use the Content Moderation API.

Facebook, Google and Amazon, in short, have traditionally been the kingmakers of internet; no one, not even the richest people in the world, have enough money to buy their way out of the apps we use.

Ultimately, this is a good thing. It's how all markets function. The problem is that these companies are incredibly profitable and will never do anything that hurts their bottom line. They will instead monetize whatever they can. In some cases, they can be sued for what they do. In others they can be forced to comply by legislation such as the GDPR, the EU's Data Protection Directive. But the fallout has not been the forced divestment of an EU company; it has been loss of data privacy in the EU and potential loss of access for non-EU companies such as mine. 5ec8ef588b
