click the ap button to display the below screen. you'll also need the imei of your device. if you are unsure of the imei, there are two methods to find it: press and hold home + power until the device reboots. after the device boots, look on the screen for the imei. you may have to tap the various buttons multiple times. once you see the number in the top left corner of the screen, this is your imei number. if the android version on your phone is higher than 4.2. (i.e. 4.4 kitkat), the imei is a large, almost square lcd-like screen on the back of your phone. to get the imei number on your device, simply take a picture of the back of your phone, upload the photo to the google play store, and search for your imei number. it will appear on the top right corner of the thumbnail. note, if you have a device with a different carrier (e.g. t-mobile, at&t, sprint, us cellular, etc.), your imei will show on the box or model number instead of the phone. click the pda button to display the below screen. then click the ok button at the bottom. if you are using an international device with a different country or carrier, you'll also need to supply the network type (mcc/mnc) as well as the region. if your device is not in the supported list, double-check that you typed the imei correctly. a new window will open, letting you know that you will be downloading a firmware file called "android.tar.md5sum". this is a md5sum hash file that checks the integrity of the file. if you've previously downloaded this file, just open the file, verify the hash and click the start button to confirm you've downloaded the correct file. if the file doesn't appear, redownload the file from the aforementioned link. this will connect to a server and download the file for you. note that in some countries, you may have to click the refresh button to see the progress of the download.
