Built around an Xilinx XC2C400 FPGA, the device has its own registers and reconfigurable interconnects that allow applications to be developed in a similar fashion to non-FPGA devices (such as FPGAs in the Virtex series). Xilinx had previously called this concept an Accelon, but has now decided to change the name to EMU. At the moment, the PC motherboard manufacturers have a significant advantage over the FPGA manufacturers, and this advantage will not be lost unless EMU chips come on the market. The XC2C400 has an incredible increase in performance over the Virtex5 FPGAs that Xilinx uses in other products. With an XC2C400, you will be able to have a 1GHz device with 500 core/mm2. Most FPGAs only reach 100MHz with 50% of the same density. 5ec8ef588b
