If I were to bet on this right now I would bet that we are going to see the the first live streaming video service to be using WebRTC and WebTorrent in a couple years, probably once the Mozilla foundation is getting closer to releasing that code and so on. Now theres a lot of promise in the model that WebTorrent has. I think that once it gets out the gate and it grows a little bit, and theres a decent sized block chain, it will be interesting to see people use it as a platform and this sort of native protocol for things like video, which are already kind of the last bastion of peer-to-peer because they need to be completely decentralized and cannot be altered; unlike software, which can be updated on a regular basis, and so on. And then we are even thinking of products that are much more advanced than that, and that are probably going to be like AV-over-IP and stuff like that, where we can potentially send audio and video between each other in a peer-to-peer fashion using WebTorrent as a platform. I think that's where it's really going to start to change things in the really exciting way. So the reality is, there are no such things as details. There are things called challenges, and I think that's where we live right now. So I would say, all right, if this works, how do we figure it out, because this is really the big question that I'm sure you guys are thinking about: How do you figure out this thing, how do you make it work for millions of people. I guess the best way to think about the problem is we have to figure out how to make it transactable, meaning; how do we make it possible for a user to join a service, download a torrent, and have it actually work. How do we solve latency, how do we keep this application running, how do we make sure that everybody has the same view of the content? What are the things in terms of technology that you have to invent? Or at least have a good idea of how to invent? And the real difficulty here is, how do we make it practically implementable and still have the core benefits of WebTorrent, and how do we make sure that we do that in a way that doesn't make it a pain to use and still make it easy for users to try this.
