once you have logged in, your next steps will depend on the tool you are using. for example, httpptamper can be used to find the username and password of the site. if a username is entered, the tool will then attempt to find the password using bruteforcing, which can take a large amount of time. after you have found the correct password for your site, you can then use burp to force the right password in the browser to try to login to the site. because burp has a built-in web browser, all requests are routed to burp's servers, so it is not necessary to install and configure your own proxy. for example, the following screenshots show how httpptamper can be used to 'guess' the username and then check the login page for the current username and password. see previous screenshot for the next tutorial if your website has a username and password field, and the site is not encrypted, there is not much you need to do. burp will automatically attempt to login to the website and gather the form variables. even if there is a captcha field, you can still use burp to guess at the user name and password combination. this way, we do not have to install a proxy server or even bother to change the proxy settings on your computer. for firefox, the burp user interface is different.
