Since I still want to keep my Lightroom, I could get Lightroom 5.1 for free with a Creative Cloud membership that costs $10 per month plus tax in the United States. As you can see, this plan is not cheap. The use of multiple tools in one package is why Lightroom 5 will never be as good as Photoshop and why this move is problematic. I won't ask for your business in this blog post, but I can tell you that Adobe's decision was really tough for me. Of course, the real thing to stop and look at is the post-processing and editing. Everything seems to be very fast (assuming your undo's work), as shown in the "Where Photoshop Beat" section. If you compare Lightroom and Photoshop and look at post processing, then Lightroom clearly has the lead. Photoshop doesn't even seem to have the ability to apply adjustments (like an Exposure slider) to the whole photo. If those changes are applied to the entire image, then I don't see the cool look you get from the "Layer Differ" feature. I also would have expected a batch Editing feature with it. Now, we all know that certain features are better in one product versus the other. However, that doesn't mean that the feature isn't there. It's especially obvious when I open up the History tab. Remember, nothing is permanent. Everything "disappears". Except for the fact Lightroom does keep history. Making a selection, an Adjustment Layer, etc. is permanent. Lightroom users also have the advantage of the History panel, which as a base, the History tab is in. Otherwise, I can't think of much that's different. The exception is the ability to create a Selection Mask with Lightroom versus having to create a Layer Mask from within the Layer or from a menu. I think that's just a minor detail, really. I spent a lot of time in Lightroom and Photoshop.
