Line Reader No NoEarly and late outcome after antepartum myomectomy. To evaluate the efficacy of myomectomy performed during pregnancy to relieve uterine enlargement and to determine the risk factors for the development of a postoperative morbidity. From January 2000 to September 2002, 21 patients with uterine leiomyomas that were preoperatively diagnosed to have undergone a subserosal myomectomy during pregnancy were included in this retrospective study. The patients' mean age was 33.4 +/- 2.5 years, and the mean gestational age at delivery was 38.3 +/- 2.7 weeks. Myomectomy was performed without the aid of intraoperative ultrasonography or laparoscopy, and the median duration of the surgical procedure was 5.5 hours. All patients were hospitalized until the delivery, and were followed up to obtain information about perinatal outcomes. The mean follow-up period was 21.7 +/- 4.6 months (range 12-48 months). Intraoperative blood loss during myomectomy was 855 +/- 411 ml. Blood loss was not statistically correlated with gestational age, the duration of surgical procedure, or the amount of myoma removed. Two patients developed postoperative fever. Subsequently, one patient required a blood transfusion and underwent hysterectomy because of hematologic complications, and the other did not undergo blood transfusion. Three patients developed a postoperative uterine rupture at 33 to 34 weeks of gestation, and two of them underwent a hysterectomy, but one was managed with a conservative approach. A significant proportion of women with uterine leiomyomas may develop a late uterine rupture if the myomectomy is performed late in pregnancy. In such cases, a conservative approach to the management of the retained myoma should be considered.
