Some TV and film production companies are throwing good money at their game shows; they're spending millions to produce game shows like Donald Trump's The Celebrity Apprentice and Kathie Lee Gifford's CBS trivia game show, The Moment Of Truth, which takes place in New York City. But some of the world's biggest game companies are looking for new revenue streams—and the world of trivia is a wealth of possibility. Game shows are great for all ages. Their simple rules and easy-to-follow format help to bridge the age gap between kids and adults. Plus, the shows are good for the environment, requiring far fewer sets and sets of props than their scripted entertainment cousins. They're not even that expensive—the average game show costs about $15,000 to produce. And they're great for traffic. A 30-minute trivia show on the Game Show Network brought 1.8 million viewers. As the industry matures, some game companies want to adapt their shows for the internet age. The Public Library of Science's PLoS Currents questions series is, essentially, a digital version of the Trivial Pursuit. It lets users answer questions for other users, based on factual information, and then lets the community vote on which answer is the most accurate. "Kids have long shown an affinity for trivia," says Mark Duffin, executive director for the American Society for Training and Development. "TV and game shows are a great way to get kids interested in learning about the world around them. They're better-suited for adult audiences than scripted entertainment, because when they lose they have to pay a penalty." Yet no one is making a big dent in the space. Not as many game shows are being produced as in the past, says the show's producer, Fred Lassander. In today's economy, fewer people are interested in sitting through another hour-long TV show, and even fewer people are interested in watching game shows that go on for more than 30 minutes. While the genre will continue to exist, its future is mixed. Game shows are still good for younger audiences, but they won't be
