The other fundamental principle of Photoshop is that it is a vector-based program (meaning that it's designed to work with lines instead of pixels). This makes it possible for you to zoom in and out and explore areas of your design with ease. Software that is based on pixels can eventually become difficult to work with, as you might have to make adjustments to a very small element of your design. This is why Photoshop is so intuitive: you can make changes and move things around with no loss of quality. A vector program that also allows you to zoom in and out makes it easy to view your design on a pixel level.

This is a smart evolution of the product, offering the best experience of the latest technology. It has been improved with helpful and efficient toolbars, according to the most exact needs of the user. A new Adobe Creative Cloud design feature will let you share a Photoshop file in a web browser with just a click of a button. You can upload your file to a website—anywhere—and when you return to Photoshop, it opens your web page automatically, ready for you to make any changes. A click of the Share button opens the file in the web browser to let your stakeholders comment or review on it directly in the online space. The new Match Photo feature allows you to change the color of a photo’s highlights, shadows, and colors based on real world light. The feature works better than humans, because you can adjust the background once and forget about it. Say you want a green dress in a photo. The Match Photo workflow lets your process match the dress to the background, then go
