ABCG2 is a transmembrane transporter responsible for the cell surface extrusion of sterols, including the anticancer agents, mitoxantrone, topotecan, and a growing number of lipophilic compounds. We now report the expression of a second transporter, ABCG2, which shares 98% amino acid identity and also functions in xenobiotic efflux, but is localized to intracellular organelles. Protein and mRNA analysis suggest that ABCG2 is endocytosed to a vacuolar compartment where it may function as a thiol transporter. A series of intracellular traffic modifiers reveal that ABCG2 is also capable of facilitating macromolecular trafficking to early and late endosomes. The interplay between ABCG2 and other transporters at endosomes in drug export, efflux of low molecular weight molecules, and regulation of signal transduction is discussed.Q: Omit prior hint The following solution of the Codingbat (problem: def noOp(x: Int): Int = x val fun = noOp // def fun(x: Int): Int = x Question: Why is there a compiler warning on the following line? val fun = noOp The problem with the warning is that it seems to be hiding some behavior with regards to how fun is being assigned to. If we remove the warning, then the behavior will be undefined, because it is not being assigned to a variable. Is there a better way of going about this without getting rid of the warning? A: val fun = noOp declares a temporary variable, fun. It's implicitly converted to a function, returning a function with the same name as the val. It's equivalent to val fun2 = () => { fun } In this example, fun2 has no side-effects, so it's valid, as the compiler implicitly optimizes it to a no-op. val fun3 = { // implicitly returns () => fun
